If you are new to PowerPoint, follow these tips to start with animations. 1. Transition vs Object Animations One of the first things you need to be aware of when using PowerPoint animations is the difference between transitioning animations and object animations. On PowerPoint, you can analyze every object you add to your slides. While it can be useful when offering key points in a presentation, you should try to keep object animations to a minimum. You can also add transition animations to your slides. These animations help to create smoother transitions between slides. 2. Time it perfectly adds every animation you add in PowerPoint can be adjusted to your preference by times for the duration of the animation as well as adding delays. It is up to you to with different settings to find the right time and delays for your animations. Try to keep animations short and sweet. 3. Stacking Various Animations Another useful feature of PowerPoint animations is the ability to stack multiple animations for objects. For example, you can add both entrance and exit animations for each object on your slide by stacking different animation effects. Stacking animations can drastically increase the duration of your slide show deals so use this feature only when necessary. 4. Automatic vs Controlled Animations Controlled Animations provides a great advantage when you reveal the delivery of specific types of deals such as product and function. For example, if you want to talk about key points in your speech, you can use controlled animations to reveal those points one at a time on your mouse click or use a remote. You can also set your animations to play automatically so they flow through your slide deals without clicking for each slide to get started. 5. Keep it simple overall, you should try to keep animations to a minimum and avoid using the more flashing animations in your presentations. For example, it's completely good to add a deaf-in transition effect to your slides. However, adding flashing and refusing animations can hurt your reputation as a professional. Stick to the simple and minimal animations to make your presentations more entertaining and easier to look at. Microsoft PowerPoint (PPT) is the go-to choice for creating deals.
